December 10, 2009, Atlanta, Georgia –At 10 a.m. today, Commissioner Brad Douglas of the Department of Administrative Services (DOAS) will testify on Georgia's Procurement Transformation before the U.S. Senate Budget Committee Task Force on Government Performance. The Task Force is charged with examining the federal government's management practices and identifying opportunities to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of federal programs and services. The Commissioner will share Georgia's efforts to transform our state government into "best managed" status in the hopes of assisting implementation of similar practices on a national level.

The Department of Administrative Services is the business solutions arm of state government that provides consultative and reliable, value-added products and services to state of Georgia agencies, colleges and universities. A "customer focused, performance driven" organization, DOAS seeks to help state entities avoid redundant costs by supplying the administrative assistance needed to focus on their other mission-related business. Services include centralized state purchasing and associated training, management of the state's fleet, risk management and the redistribution and disposal of state personal property.
